The carcass of the sea lion, after it is stripped of its hide and disembowled, is hung up in cool weather by its hind flippers over a rnde wooden frame, or labaaas, as the natives call it; where, together with many more bodies of fur seals treated in the same manner, it serves from November until the following season of May, as the meat house of the Alent on St. Paul and St. George. Exposed in this manner to the open weather, the natives keep their seal meat almost any length of time in winter for use; and, like our old duck and bird hunters, they say they prefer to have the meat tainted rather than fresh, declaring that it is most tender and toothsome when decidedly lond. In 1872, when slowly sketching by measurements the outlines of a fine adult bull sea lion which the ball from Booterin s rifle had just destroyed, an old starooka came up abruptly. Not seeming to see me, she deliberately threw down a large, greasy, skin meat bag: she whipped out a knife and went to work on my specimen. Curiosity prompted me to keep still, in spite of the first sensation of annoyance, so that I might watch her choice and use of the animal s carcass. She first removed the skin, being actively aided in this operation by an uncouth boy; she then cut..
